Periods of heightened volatility persisted through the month, driven by geopolitical escalation and a sharp repricing in energy markets. This added renewed uncertainty around inflation and interest rate expectations, resulting in a broad reassessment of risk across equity markets. The Fund was defensively positioned heading into this, ultimately falling 3.7% over the month compared to the 7.2% fall by the ASX200.

Key supportive positioning in the Fund was a significant position in energy stocks. Energy companies Ampol (+22.9%), Woodside (+28.7%), Santos (+17.8%) and Omega Oil and Gas (+35.7%) all made strong contributions and the Fund also had Woodside call options before the conflict began which produced a strong gain.

Other than energy, the Fund did well with above normal cash holdings and profits made on our ASX200 put options. The underweight position in mining stocks helped on a relative basis and the Fund bought mining company BHP Group shares into the weakness. Banks – which the Fund has a relatively small exposure to – held up well for most of the month before showing weakness in the final week.

Main negative contributors over the month were laboratory analysis company ALS (-18.8%) and Virgin Australia (-23.6%). However these losses were reasonably limited and overall the portfolio performed well.

Over the month, the Fund largely managed its positioning through derivatives, adding exposure on weakness and selling again on strength. If a ceasefire occurs in the near-term, markets will likely rally further. But the extent of the rally is likely somewhat limited given the damage already done to oil production and flows that will weigh on growth and keep interest rates somewhat elevated for the rest of the year. If a ceasefire is not achieved, or another way is not found to substantially increase oil production and flows, then we will likely see more market weakness. Given this dynamic the Fund has maintained a reasonably cautious stance but will buy weakness in the broader market and specific companies when the opportunities are there.
